Enrolment in unfunded Christian highs teeters

Bert Witvoet

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — Has the lack of public funding affected the enrolment at Christian high schools in Ontario? Yes and no, according to a survey of principals of the 11 Ontario secondary schools affiliated with Christian schools International (CSI).

They report that support for Christian education is holding fairly well and that committed parents will send their children even though the cost is high. But greater demands for suitable education which especially the smaller schools cannot always afford seems to stunt the growth of Christian education at the secondary level.

Enrolment is down a bit in six of the 11 CIS high schools, mainly because of a demographic decline in the upper elementary grades. Grade nines this year tend to be a bit smaller in most schools than the grade twelves that graduated last year. But from Kindergarten to Grade 4 or 5 things are looking up again with larger classes.

Some schools are experiencing growth. Woodland Christian High School in Breslau shows a 13 per cent growth this year. Most of this is due to the fact that a dozen or so students are staying for a fifth year to take OACs (Ontario Academic Courses which replace Grade 13 courses). Toronto District Christian High School is showing a six per cent growth, also mainly because of the fact that there are 50 Grade 13 students this year.

The only other school showing growth is Quinte Christian High School (six per cent). According to Principal Peter Van Huizen this is mainly because Kingston Christian School is sending more students this year and more students are coming from denominations other than the Christian Reformed Church.

Choice in education

Beacon Christian High School in St. Catharines is experiencing the greatest decline with 15 per cent. Principal Henry Kater reports that Grade 9 has 10 fewer students than last year's Grade 12. In addition, however, six students have left in the upper grades. He cites three reasons for this — student preference, parental disagreement with school philosophy and finances. Kater is looking towards the 1989-1990 school year for growth, when its feeder school Calvin Memorial will begin graduating larger classes again.

London District Christian Secondary School reports a loss to the public school of about 19 families (total enrolment 282). Principal Henry Kooy thinks that some students are looking for a more technical education. "In a number of cases the kids have more say in the matter of what school they should attend than parents," he adds.

Korean people need gradual change, says graduate student

Robert VanderVennen

TORONTO, Ont. — "I pray for real change in the Korean government — but gradual change," said Korean student Kuk-Won Shin this week in an interview with Calvinist Contact. "In 1960 the students overthrew the government, but didn't have the ability to carry on, so the military took over in a coup. I hope that now the opposition party is ready to govern, but if not, the Korean people must be patient and work for progressive change — not instant, total change."

Shin is a doctoral student at the Institute for Christian Studies (ICS). He lives in Toronto with his wife Dong-Won and their baby daughter.

Major constitutional changes are needed, centred in the position of the presidency, says Shin. "The president must be directly elected by the people, not by the electoral college which is a tool of the president. There must be a better balance of power between the president and the parliament, which at present has little power," he adds.

Christian participation

Christians have been in the forefront of protests against the government in Korea. Professors at liberal seminaries have a history of political action and have suffered for their convictions, sometimes even by being imprisoned.

Liberation theology has had a great impact on radical Korean students. The distinctive Korean form of liberation theology is called "Peoples Theology," says Shin. Courses in Korean liberation theology are now being taught at American seminaries like Union and Princeton. Bible study groups called "consensation circles" have sprung up at seminaries and other places where people study the Bible in the light of their current situation.

"Conservative Christians in Korea — and most Christians there are Presbyterians — tend to be passive and apathetic about politics," says Shin. Their heritage from American Presbyterian missionaries is to believe that it is not God's will for Christians to agitate against the government, since in Romans 13 we are told to be in subjection to the higher powers.

Therefore, most Korean students who are evangelical Christians do not participate in demonstrations even though they are sympathetic to the aims of the demonstrators. Shin says they feel guilty about not participating, and this tension leads them to struggle with the question of what it means to be a Calvinist.

its problems of technical education. Being located next to a public high school, it is allowed to send its students to take technical courses in the public school. Transportation to Quinte CHS is tied in with buses going to the separate school, which is also down the road a bit. Quinte has excellent relations with local boards.

The survey indicated that those schools with more to offer do better in attracting students. Some principals felt that funding would help them provide better facilities and more courses, which in turn would attract more students.

Some principals indicate that today's parents are looking for quality Christian education. The emphasis, according to Hamilton principal Ron Dirkse is shifting to "a little bit of consumerism," the stepchild of "materialism." The time-honoured principle of Christian education for all Christian children is pushed aside in favour of concerns about how good the teacher is, how suitable the courses are and how well son or daughter fit into the social fabric. While acknowledging that Christian schools must rise to the challenge of producing quality education, Dirkse nevertheless laments the shift in emphasis.

Tuition medley

Most principals feel that tuition costs by themselves do not deter parents. Tuition fees differ from school to school. Many have a sliding scale according to income (at Chatham District Christian Secondary parents pay anywhere from $3,000 to $9,000); some have two rates, one for families who send children to both Christian elementary and high, and one for those who enrol in Christian high only (Smithville — $3,500 and $4,800). Beacon in St. Catharines asks $5,000 per family, which covers enrolment in both elementary and secondary or in Beacon only. In Bowmanville the fee is $4,200 for one child and about $5,300 for the family.

London District Christian Secondary seems to have the most original system. Chapters in the school society are assessed a certain percentage of the budget, according to number of families. After that it's up to the chapters to decide how much tuition their families pay.

Durham Principal Ren Siebenga (Bowmanville) finds that the high cost of tuition is an obstacle for people who are new to the Christian school idea. "It's a massive leap of faith to step from paying nothing to paying $4,200," he observes. He thinks that government funding would help these people. For those who are used to it, tuition costs are no real obstacle, he says. "It's been a fat year. There's plenty of money around. We should be storing it up for the lean years."

Going beyond the pale

Some schools are not as dependent for enrolment on trends in the Christian Reformed community as others. Redeemer Christian High School in Ottawa has the highest overall percentage of non-Christian Reformed students attending. This year it's about 30 per cent, Principal Derek Maggs discovered, although his previously uninformed and wishful opinion had it at 50 per cent.

Quinte Christian High School is showing more promise for the future in this department, with 12 per cent non-CRC in Grade 12 and 50 per cent in Grade 9. Principal Van Huizen agrees with other principals that these trends are most heavily influenced by what happens at the elementary level. Trenton and Belleville Christian schools, the two main feeder schools, show a steady increase here.

Showing a percentage of non-CRC of 10 per cent or less are Sarnia, Bowmanville, Smithville, St. Catharines and London. The figures for Hamilton and Toronto were not given, although Dirkse of Hamilton thought it was low in his school.

The facts

Some schools are experiencing a boost in enrolment because of people moving into the area. Toronto finds that people are moving back into the area because of employment opportunities. Hamilton has seen families move in because of the presence of Redeemer College.

In actual fact the numbers in each school are:

Redeemer Christian High School in Ottawa — 76 students this year; 80 students last year.

Quinte Christian High School in Belleville — 115 students this year; 108 students last year.

Durham Christian High School in Bowmanville — 124 students this year; 140 students last year.

Toronto District Christian High School in Woodbridge — 380 students this year; 360 last year.

Hamilton District Christian High School in Hamilton — 330 this year; about the same last year.

Woodland Christian High School in Breslau — 148 this year; 131 last year.

Smithville District Christian High School in Smithville — 175 this year; 190 last year.

Beacon Christian High School in St. Catharines — 133 this year; 157 last year.

London District Christian Secondary School in London — 282 this year; 304 last year.

Chatham District Christian Secondary School in Chatham — 91 this year; 93 last year.

Lambton Christian High School in Sarnia — 81 this year; 90 last year.

Christian educators meet in Third World

Robert VanderVennen

Canadian professors George Vandervelde of the Institute for Christian Studies and Harry Groenewold of The King's College, Edmonton, were among Christian scholars from 30 nations who met in Lusaka, Zambia, to discuss the role of Christian higher education in different parts of the world.

The occasion was the fifth triennial meeting of the International Council for the Promotion of Christian Higher Education. The purpose of the Council, founded in 1975, is to link together and encourage co-operation among mainly Reformed Christian colleges, universities and seminaries, and their faculty members, throughout the world.

A highlight of this conference was the active participation of the president of Zambia, Dr. Kenneth Kaunda. He gave a major address and hosted two receptions for the delegates. In his address, which was politically and religiously highly-charged, he appealed to the conferees as brothers and sisters in Christ to show solidarity with his people in the struggle against racism and oppression.

"What a man and fine Christian is Kenneth Kaunda," commented Dr. Bob Goudzwaard of the Free University of Amsterdam. "He even sang a Zambian song for the Africaners at our conference, a song praying that the Holy Spirit might come on them."

President John Hulst of Dordt College is Chairman of the International Council. Dr. John Vander Stelt is Executive Secretary. In addition to Vander Stelt, Vandervelde and Goudzwaard, speakers at the conference included Dr. C.F. Beyers Naudé of South Africa, Dr. Nicholas Wolterstorff of Calvin College, Dr. John Van Dyk of Dordt College, Dr. Klaas Runia of The Netherlands, and Dr. John Orkar of Nigeria, who lived for some years in Winnipeg and in Halifax.

"What made this conference a unique event," said Vandervelde, "was the people who attended and the Zambian setting. The setting confronted one with the obvious poverty and the overwhelming generosity and kindness of the Zambian people."

He added, "I was deeply struck by the weakness and vulnerability of the Christian church in many parts of the world, especially in minority situations and in communistic and Islamic settings." He strongly urges support for the Council for the stimulus it gives to the worldwide mission of Christian higher education.

Korean people need gradual change, says student

These tensions stimulate interest in the search for integral Christian thinking, also in academic studies. For example, in the past two years there is greatly increased interest among Koreans in the work of the Institute for Christian Studies.

Changes in Korean society

Korean society is undergoing major changes at a breathtaking pace. Economically, Korea has come like a comet on the world scene, a large middle class has arisen of which more than 80 per cent are college graduates, Koreans are travelling all over the world and now they want their government structures to fit the modern world.

There is all too little experience with democratic government in Korea. Japan ruled Korea from 1919 to 1945, and then American military rule took over. Elected governments have tended to be run by strongman presidents. The heavy hand of the United States was evident again very recently when President Reagan objected to the proclamation of martial law in Korea.

Returning to Korea as professor

Yet these are exciting times in Korea. Kuk-Won and his family look forward to returning home to Korea as soon as he finishes his Ph.D. studies with Hendrik Hart at ICS. He would like to return to the teaching of Calvinistic philosophy which he did in 1984-85 at Chong Shin College, the theological college of the Korean Presbyterian General Assembly (Hab-Dong). From 1980-84 he was a student at Westminster Theological Seminary, where he received the Master of Divinity and Master of Theology degrees.

Farmers seek alternative to tobacco crops

Marcus Van Steen

(Canadian Scene) — A remarkable phenomenon of this decade is that for the first time smokers have been put on the defensive.

This doesn't mean smoking has been eliminated. Canadians in 1986 consumed more than 3,500 cigarettes per adult per year. This is higher than the U.S. figure and is almost one thousand cigarettes a year ahead of British smokers who have a reputation for tobacco addiction.

This level of smoking, astronomical though it is, actually represents a five per cent decline from 1981. There has been a gradual drop in smoking since the publication of medical evidence of health risks associated with tobacco. However, this was not viewed with undue alarm by the tobacco industry which has survived many ups and downs in the 400 years since tobacco reached Europe from the American colonies.

Doctors, philosophers and church leaders denounced it as a noxious weed. Smokers in Russia and some Islamic nations were put to death. In some parts of eastern Europe anyone caught using tobacco had his nose or ears cut off. In western Europe smokers were thrown in jail. And the church fought a long war against the "noxious weed." In spite of all this, tobacco users persisted, even after the whole world followed the example of France and England and imposed heavy taxes on tobacco.

It is becoming clear that the smoking habit which flourished in the face of denunciation, persecution and taxation, is falling victim to social pressures in the western nations. Smokers now find that their habit is not socially acceptable. The tobacco companies, while seeking new markets in the third world countries where smoking is still fashionable, are diversifying into such businesses as food and beverages. But what is the Canadian tobacco farmer to do?

Tobacco as a crop was of little significance in Canada until cigarette smoking became a world-wide habit in the 1920s. It was found that the parched, sandy soil of southern Ontario was suited for the cultivation of Virginia leaf tobacco from which most cigarettes are made. By 1978, 100,000 hectares of the Niagara region were devoted to tobacco, producing an annual harvest worth about $90 million. It was the most valuable cash crop in Ontario. This year the tobacco crop has shrunk to less than $70 million.

A few years ago some of the farmers saw that a change was coming and managed to get into new crops, such as ginseng and peanuts, or retired from farming altogether. But about 2,000 tobacco growers were not as far-sighted, or were unable to find alternatives. The Ontario and Federal governments are now co-operating on a program to help tobacco growers who wish to develop new crops. Specialists at the federal experimental farms are trying to determine what might be suited to the area. It is not only the soil and the climate that have to be taken into consideration, but also what product can be produced and marketed successfully. For example, there is some doubt that peanuts produced in Ontario could compete in price with the vast amounts of peanuts grown in the United States.

One suggestion put forward so far is the evening primrose, which could be grown abundantly in southern Ontario, and which produces an oil that is in demand by the pharmaceutical industry.

Christian broadcasters now free to speak their views

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP)

— The Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) decision to abolish the 38-year-old Fairness Doctrine, on the grounds that it unconstitutionally restricts freedom of speech by broadcasters, has been greeted warmly by Christian broadcasters, who say the change will allow them to deal more directly with controversial issues.

"Christian broadcasting will be enhanced, and we'll see more programs of a controversial nature because they won't be discouraged by the Fairness Doctrine," predicted Ben Armstrong, executive director of National Religious Broadcasters (NRB).

Armstrong explained that although the Fairness Doctrine was meant to encourage balanced discussions of controversial issues, it had a chilling effect because stations tended to avoid controversy to skirt Fairness Doctrine requirements. "Stations felt obliged to eliminate that kind of programming," Armstrong noted.

"We called it the 'Unfairness Doctrine' because it had a chilling effect on the ability of religious broadcasters to engage in the discussion of controversial issues of public importance."

Fairness Doctrine concerns have led to Christian programs being censored, Armstrong explained, citing a James Robison program on homosexuality that was rejected in Texas, and the Mutual Radio Network's dropping of the Lutheran Hour because of abortion-related content. "These are cases of a Christian broadcaster being hurt by the Fairness Doctrine," said Armstrong. "The station, instead of getting someone on the air to present an opposing view, they just dropped the program."

Wayne Pederson, station manager for KTIS Radio in St. Paul, Minnesota, the flagship station of the Northwestern College Radio Network, said of the decision, "It frees us. In the past there was an obligation to present both sides or all sides of an issue. As a Christian station if we advocate a particular position, we are now free to present whatever side we want without an obligation to let, say a pro-abortion group, get their licks in. From a Christian standpoint it's a help."

Pederson said the FCC policy change won't make a big difference in the way his station presents news and issues. "Even though we'll feel a little more relaxed in covering issues, I think we'll still try to present the different sides of an issue, balanced coverage. That's our journalistic responsibility."

Jim Shedd, assistant station manager to Chicago's WMBI, the Moody Bible station, said the policy change could "give freedom to express a biblical or Christian view on some social issues without being quite as concerned about having to offer time to air a rebuttal. It doesn't mean we're going to go all out attacking the Jehovah's Witnesses or the Moonies or whoever, but it does mean we would not be expected to grant equal time to someone from one of those organizations to come on and give their view. In the case of some cults, it might take some of the pressure off there."

Shedd, like the other Christian broadcasters contacted, has adopted a "wait and see" attitude on the FCC's decision. Although the FCC commissioners voted unanimously to scrap the doctrine, various members of Congress have announced their intention to reinstate the policy as law.

Editorial

Is there forgiveness after the sin against the social spirit?

The article in The Toronto Star of Aug. 25 is entitled "The Case Against Funding of Religious Schools" and is written by John Fraser, a leading figure in public education in Ontario. It is cleverly written and will, no doubt, persuade some Ontario citizens that support for independent schools is not a good idea (The Star editorialized against funding of private schools a week earlier). Mr. Fraser's argument is very logical ... once you step into his world of thinking and believing. It is also very dangerous in that it undermines the kind of freedom that still separates our society from totalitarian ones.

Mr. Fraser paints the following scenario: "Suppose, for a moment, that your neighbourhood school decided to organize its classrooms along these lines: Baptist children in one classroom, Jewish children in another, Dutch Reformed in one, economically advantaged in another, and so on. The Human Rights Commission would not tolerate that kind of discrimination for one moment. Even a hint of differentiated treatment of children invites a prompt and angry response. Our Charter demands equal treatment of all."

With one little, seemingly innocent, example Mr. Fraser has raised the twentieth-century spectre of discrimination and has made an appeal to another twentieth-century sacred cow — human rights. Woe unto those people who commit blasphemy against the god of assimilation by asking for funds to finance their discriminatory practice of separating society's children.

The rule of numbers

The root of the argument is familiar, of course. Only the outward form changes with time and speaker. Underneath the logic lies the belief that all children of a given society should be educated in a system that is shaped by the convictions of the majority of people in that society. To depart from that majority view is to discriminate, to upset the "equal treatment" guaranteed by charter, and as a result, to invite an angry response from the majority whose view of what is best for all has been thwarted.

No doubt, Mr. Fraser will argue, as have others, that the majority shows great tolerance by allowing minorities to operate their own schools, as long as they don't come asking for money. Why is it wrong to ask for money? Because that money has been set aside for the system that the majority favours. It's "majority" money for "majority" schools. Simple rules for accounting apply. How can "public" money be used for "private" schools? That's like having a bank take money from one account and putting it into another. It's a violation of trust!

The lie of "equality"

What is worrisome about this position is not the fact that independent schools are denied money collected also from their own supporters (no one is after Mr. Fraser's money!). Most parents will, strangely enough, benefit spiritually from the discipline of a family budget reduced by additional tuition costs, even if acknowledgement of that sometimes comes after the fact. Our concern comes with knowing that the lie of "equality" is stated with such indignant righteousness.

Anyone who has ever read anything about life under the ideological dictatorship of communism will recall how easy it is to become a traitor to a communist society. All one has to do, for example, is educate one's child according to non-communist beliefs. That too "invites a prompt and angry response," except that the penalty is much heavier — like 20 years of slavery in a labour camp.

There are, of course, miles of ideological development between the totalitarianism of the Soviet Union and the "majority-ism" of Canada. But one thing both "isms" have in common — a form of universalism that threatens the freedom of individuals and groups.

The lie of universalism

According to Mr. Fraser, "our society would be in chaos without the toleration and respect that is found in our public schools where children of all heritages and religion share a common set of experiences that enhance the humanity of our world." It's universalistic language through and through. It assumes that (social) evil arises from the assumption by any group or individual that the truth does not flow from the whole, but from somewhere else. Such beliefs are considered "anti-social," a term used by Mr. Fraser to tar the request for funds for independent schools.

If one is to go by the universalist definition of proper social behaviour, the behaviour of obedient Christians must be deemed anti-social. This is so because, one, Christians depend on revelation from outside the whole of society, and two, they consider the truth of their faith as binding for all of life. Christians thus challenge the claims of universalism! By doing so, they evoke accusations of arrogance and discrimination from those who will not tolerate this fly in the universalist ointment.

We don't expect to change the faith of Mr. Fraser with a brief editorial. But we would like it if all Christians, at least, would see the fallacy of universalistic thinking. We cannot serve two masters. We cannot worship Jesus Christ and the god of assimilation!

"I am the way and the truth," Jesus said to his followers. That kind of statement brooks no flirting with Mr. Fraser's belief that "the dignity of man, regardless of religious orientation," must be the fulcrum of our children's education. Christ is that ultimate point for us. And from faith in Christ flows not tolerance, but love and long-suffering. It takes a non-universalist believer to know the difference.

JUST A MOMENT/HERMAN PRAAMSMA

"I have laid up Thy word in my heart
..."
(Ps. 119:11)

How on earth can anybody speak on behalf of God? And why is Billy Graham still popular and respected, while so many people are skeptical of the church and faith?

I suspect that there is relationship between those two questions. There are people today who most emphatically deny that it is possible to speak "with the voice of God." At the most we can draw lessons from experiences people had with God. Such experiences are described in the Bible. The Bible contains many examples of people struggling with fear and doubt, people affirming their hope and faith, people bound by their own times and culture who reached out to God. The Spirit who drove these people may assist us as well today as we seek to struggle and affirm in our own times.

Good luck, eh?!

Then there are people who equally emphatically state that God speaks clearly today. As a matter of fact, He speaks to them. And as God speaks to them He goes into all kinds of fine detail: about money He wants raised, healings He is about to perform, and buildings He wants erected; "God told me"

How can you argue with that, eh?!

Meanwhile, it is really no wonder that so many are skeptical of "religion." You don't really need an organized church to tell you to do your best if there is no real word from the Lord. And most people have too much God-given common sense to be anything but amused by claims of religious free-lance artists who claim a pipe-line to heaven.

Which brings me to Billy Graham. Why is he respected and listened to, even in spite of his somewhat naive statements in Moscow a few years ago? It's really quite simple. It is because Graham is a servant of the Word. If people attend his rallies they invariably go home with the phrase ringing in their ears: "The Bible says..." "The scriptures say..."

Graham is not afraid of the "thus says the Lord." And that saying of the Lord can be verified, checked and read with your own eyes. There is a clear message there, and it is a message that is needed, a message that finds an echo in the hearts of those who hear it.

"So we are ambassadors for Christ, God making his appeal through us" (II Cor. 5:20)

The clear sound of the gospel is the voice of God in his world. And that gospel is recorded in the scriptures.

How on earth can anyone speak on behalf of God?

Why not let God speak for himself?!

Herman Praamsma is pastor of the Fellowship Christian Reformed Church in Rexdale, Ontario.

C.C. announces:

Marian is back

We are happy to have Marian Van Til return to us after a lengthy illness. Her operation was successful and we hope that she may resume her editorial work here with enthusiasm. Marguerite Witvoet, who had taken her place since February of this year, returns to school. But she will continue to contribute to Calvinist Contact from time to time. This week's church page is still her work.

Innovations and changes

With this issue we introduce a few new items. The front-page logo is moved up so that the flow of copy is a little better and pictures are more easily placed.

The editorial and letters pages are shifted down two pages, making room for the news stories and the "between the Lines" column. Gerald Vandezande's suggestion to move up "Between the Lines" (see letter August 28) got us thinking about keeping the news stories and this column in the front section of C.C.

In addition, we hope to publish "Between the Lines" every week from now on, adding another writer to the team, high school teacher Clarence Joldersma, who will focus on environmental concerns.

To the two-some Praamsma and Rang will be added Rev. Dave Feddes from Strathroy, Ont.

This week we also start a weekly crossword puzzle. Look for it in the Events/Classified section.

Open house at C.C.

Yes, we have made a successful move to our new facility at 261 Martindale Rd. in St. Catharines. All of us were very tired after weeks of packing, moving and rearranging, but very happy about our new, modern, spacious home. Smells of paint, new carpet and outside paving are in the air. Tradesmen walk in from time to time to put the finishing touches on the building. Salesmen know the way to the complex of commercial establishments too.

It's time to shake off our preoccupation with space and things to fill it with and to get down to the serious business of publishing a weekly newspaper. It's a good thing nothing happened in the world for the two weeks we were not publishing an issue. Of course, Ben Johnson broke the world record for the 100-metre dash and a few other things did happen. But we could relax because our God was in charge.

No doubt, some of you will want to see our new facility. That opportunity will be there when we have our open house at 261 Martindale on Friday, Oct. 2 from 4 to 10 p.m. Do come and see us. We will show you around (which should not take terribly long) and serve you refreshments. If you cannot make it to the open house, stop by some other time. You are always welcome here.

Mormons and Witnesses not churches

I have been reading C.C. for some years now and find it most insightful, interesting and enjoyable. Your Canadian Church membership statistics in the Aug. 14 issue was particularly useful. However, it brings to the fore that ceaseless task of defining Christians. Two criteria must be Christology and the doctrine of the Trinity.

On page 53 of his book Christian Deviations, SCM 1972, Anglican priest Horton Davies states that:

"Jesus Christ is believed to be literally the only-begotten Son of God in the flesh, and not to have been conceived as other churches have affirmed — by the Holy Ghost. It is also believed that there are other Gods for other planets, and that the God of this earth is in a state of progression, and that men also become gods.

Elsewhere Davies claims that the Mormons are tri-theistic not Trinitarian.

On page 60 he quotes Charles Taze Russell, the founder of Jehovah's Witnesses as follow:

As he [Jesus] was the highest of all Jehovah's creation, so also was he the first, the direct creation of god, the 'only Begotten,' and then he, as Jehovah's power, and in his name created all things."

Thus I would quibble with your inclusion of the Mormons and the Jehovah's Witnesses as churches.

On the other hand you omitted the thoroughly trinitarian and christologically orthodox Anglican Catholic Church in North America which broke away from the Anglican Church of Canada during the last 20 years over, among other things, the ordination of women. I believe most dioceses of the Anglican Church of Canada have ordained women for about 15 years. It would be very interesting to know the membership of the Anglican Catholics.

Help us understand today's theology

I was pleased to read a few weeks ago that John Valk would be writing a bi-weekly column on issues in Theology/Religion intended for lay people. I was disappointed, however, by the content of the first two articles. While the articles about the Jewish sects can lead to a better understanding of the Bible and the time that Jesus lived, I had hoped that Mr. Valk would discuss current issues.

In C.C. of Aug. 14, the Pensive Dutchie, Syrt Wolters, gives his view on an article by Dr. Al Menninga. It would certainly give a more balanced view if Mr. Valk could explain what Dr. Menninga has said. If this is the same Dr. Menninga that some people wanted to drag before synod to explain his views, an article would be even more topical.

Related to the issue raised by Mr. Wolters is Van Till's book The Fourth Day. How about a series of articles explaining Van Till's thesis about the purpose of the Genesis creation account, and coming to work through this book?

I am sure that there must be many more issues which can be explained in simple language, but for the time being I look forward to seeing the articles I have suggested.

Spirit neglect explains conferences

Although Pastor Schalkwyk started his last pastoral letter on "Balanced Christianity" by saying: "Once upon a time I walked into a beautiful church in New York," he sure is not commencing a fairy tale!

I am confused as to why in a southern black church he would have liked a larger banner stating: "Jesus Only." Such a sign would fill me, a trinitarian, as surely Pastor Schalkwyk is, with suspicion.

We can recognize the danger of specializing in the Spirit. Does the pastor also see the danger of being closed and even opposed to the Spirit? There are two scripture passages one can ponder: "The letter kills, but the Spirit makes alive," and: "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the children of God." We must desire more than what creeds, confessions, and theology offer. "Intellectualism only" leads to boredom.

It should not strike Pastor Schalkwyk strange at all to read about Holy Spirit conferences. Obviously the third person is the neglected one.

Do not despise the thunder

Pastor C.A.

With an aching heart I write this article for Calvinist Contact, hoping that the reader will be able to identify with my bruised emotions, and will, together with me, condemn in no uncertain terms the light-hearted way in which some people of Reformed stock speak about sermons and their makers.

From my own considerable experience, I know that the preparation of sermons is no laughing matter, nor is the delivery of them.

Following in the formidable footsteps of our Reformed fathers, we always used to display a deep reverence and sacred awe with respect to preaching and preachers. However, in these latter days some Korahs, Dathans and Abirams (see Numbers 16:1ff; also Jude) have arisen among us, men of a rebellious spirit, who scoff at the sanctity of sermons and speak with levity about preachers and their hallowed creations.

Those prophets who are not afraid to admonish their audiences in loud and clear language, who cry out against the manifold evils of the day, who thunder against false doctrines and castigate their sheep with the bullwhip of pending judgment, are especially exposed to the barrage of derision. I proudly consider myself to be one of them.

Wedding folly

How far, yes, how agonizingly far these sermon-mockers dare to go, was demonstrated a few weeks ago on the relatively happy occasion of a wedding banquet. Three well-known Reformed ministers, men of good standing in their congregations and denomination, mind you, partook of the dinner and in good Reformed fashion feasted upon the many delicacies on the tables. So far, so good.

However, after coffee and dessert, the Master of Ceremonies summoned the three pastors to come forward and ordered them to sing a song with the disparaging title "Three little ministers," to be sung to the tune of a Dutch children's song "Drie kleine kleutertjes" ["Three little toddlers"]. The three ordained men did not only comply with this shameful request, but they also sang this office-dishonouring dirge with gusto and merriment, doubling up in laughter! How deeply fallen such leaders are!

In order that you, dear reader, may share in my disgust emanating from sound and time-tested Reformed principles, and in order that you may be aware of and alert to what is going on in our own beloved circles these days, I give you now the partial text of the outrageous song the three ministers humbled themselves to sing in public: Three little ministers Were preaching in a church, Preaching in a church. They spoke of misery, depravity and smirch, On a beautiful Sunday in early September.

Three little ministers Were thinking of their doom, Thinking of their doom. Their church had kicked them out For spreading so much gloom, On a beautiful Sunday in early September

Well, dear reader, what is your reaction? It must be one of ire and grief. And to think that I quoted only two of the six scandalous stanzas!

Heavenly fireworks

I have in my library the homiletical work of the highly-acclaimed Scottish Presbyterian theologian and poet Dr. Nelson Amos MacFyrecrackor (1741-1842). His writings should be compulsory reading for all seminarians and other would-be theologians. In his lectures to his students the venerable MacFyrecrackor tirelessly emphasizes the undeniable fact that ministers will fail and fall as preachers and blunder and stumble as pastors if they will not incessantly preach sermons loaded with brimstone, thunder and other explosives. He coined the famous phrase: "Preach and thunder, or else you'll blunder." (New English Version)

Oh, how I wish that not only the three victimized little ministers in the scandalous song quoted above, but all pastors of Reformed gut and blood would hearken to these profound and wise words of Nelson Amos MacFyrecrackor!

Pastor C.A. lives in Reformelo, Ontario.

No way out

Rated AA
Stars Kevin Costner, Gene Hackman, Sean Young, Will Patton, Howard Duff
Directed by Roger Donaldson

No Way Out is a riveting thriller with a Hitchcockian surprise-the-pants-off-you-in-the-last-five-minutes ending. Kevin Costner is superb as Farrell, the U.S. naval commander who must make a back-page murder look like the work of a Russian spy, and, therefore, a matter of national security. The catch is that Farrell secretly loved the woman who was murdered, making his job as "investigator" excruciatingly difficult. The situation becomes more and more tense as he begins to suspect his boss, the U.S. Secretary of Defense (Hackman), and his boss suspects he knows too much. Then comes that eyebrow-raising ending. Some critics have ridiculed the film because of the ending — as audience, you feel duped. But, upon closer reflection, every detail "works"; everything fits. The film is a powerful drama, made more so by the surprise, and the moral dilemma that that surprise presents. (Refreshingly, it also has several tense foot chase scenes, which overshadow the obligatory car chase.) No Way Out offers what you suspect may be an all too real picture of behind-the-scenes political intrigue in Washington. Along with Costner's excellent portrayal of the free-wheeling commander whose integrity is tested, Will Patton's characterization of the Secretary's fawning aid who is brought down by his lust for power and his misguided love for his boss, is vivid and chilling.

Pastoral Pondering The puzzle of the pews

Dave Feddes

Why do people sit where they sit? After preaching as a student in many different churches, I continue to ponder that question. Some questions are more important than mine, but few are more baffling.

I ask my question every time I preach in a box-shaped church. You know the kind: narrow and long, with people in the back row able to glimpse at the minister only through their binoculars. Every time I preach in a church like that, I have the same experience. While shaking hands after the service, a striking contrast becomes apparent.

The people who sit in the back half of the building greet me with silence or a grunt. The most I can expect is a muffled "good morning." After these people have filed past, I begin to wonder whether this just might be my worst sermon ever.

Then the people from the front half arrive. They gush appreciative remarks. They beam their approval. My head begins to swell if I do not whisper a prayer for humility. When they have passed by, I briefly consider whether or not to submit this dynamic sermon for publication.

Other ministers have noticed this striking contrast. The difference is there. That much is certain. But I still do not know why.

Those who sit in front may suggest that some people like to nap (or, in case of insomnia, read the bulletin) during the sermon. Such people naturally prefer a seat far from the voice and eyes of the minister. Their silence after the service can then be traced to the fact that they are more familiar with dreamland than with the message.

Those who prefer the back, however, may retort that those in the front like to strut down the aisle in order to be seen by others. Compliments from such show-offs are only further proof of their desire to impress others through flattery and through displaying how well they listened.

For most people, though, there is probably a different reason altogether. It is probably nothing so sorry as the previous two paragraphs. Some folks are quiet and shy. They sit in a distant and unobtrusive seat for the same reason they are silent after the service: they are reserved and silent people. Their counterparts in the front benches choose their seating for the same reason they gush their compliments: they are bolder and more outgoing.

The mystery may never be solved. Wherever people sit in church, the Lord welcomes them, and their pastor is glad to see them. But we who preach still wonder: Why do people sit where they sit?

The truth about your forefathers

Marguerite Witvoet

"They sure don't make 'em like they used to." We often say that to compare, usually negatively, modern products with those from "the old days."

Sometimes it seems they don't make people like they used to, either. Whether one hears it from history books or stories from your parents or grandparents about "the old days," it seems that, back then, people were more reliable, more morally upright, more trustworthy ... in short, they were better people than we are today.

Or were they? The records of the Lutherse Gemeente Zaandam (Lutheran Congregation of Zaandam, The Netherlands) in 1773 shed some interesting light as to the motivation behind our forefathers' faithfulness, at least in church matters. One of our readers, Bill Kelder from St. Catharines, Ont., provided us with some of the data from the Zaandam church records.

No "oncens" allowed

The records give some guidelines for enforcing church rules. Promptness must have been associated with a godly life. Anyone coming late to church had to pay two stuivers (one stuiver was 1/20th of a guilder then, and in terms of wages, is comparable to about $5 Canadian today). This crime was as bad as missing church once, which received the same fine. But missing both services was three times as bad, procuring a fine of six stuivers (almost half a day's wages for an unskilled labourer).

Even consistory meetings were under strict enforcement. Any member of consistory who was not in time for the meeting was charged two stuivers. If he did not show up at all, he was charged six stuivers (it seems it was worse to miss a consistory meeting than a church service — compare fines above).

Smoking was absolutely forbidden during the meetings. Anyone who asked for pipe and tobacco before the business meeting was finished had to pay two stuivers.

High price for trust

Attendance and smoking were minor matters, however, compared with the serious offence of disclosing confidential information to outsiders. Anyone who broke trust and talked about confidential matters outside of the meeting was charged a gouden reyder (a gold coin which was worth 14 guilders — more than two weeks' wages for a skilled labourer, or about $1400 today!)

With fines like these, it's no wonder church-goers of times past showed up so faithfully and kept their mouths shut when they were told. They couldn't afford not to!

Christian commentary on defence, politics, AIDS and maturity

The White Paper

Not many church magazines have commented on the recently published "White Paper on Defence." In it, the Minister of National Defence, Perrin Beatty, proposes the acquisition for Canada of 10-12 nuclear-powered submarines and much more military equipment for the defence of Canada's sovereignty. One magazine that came with a (guest-) editorial on the subject (by Philip Smith-Eivemark who has a background in military affairs) was Catholic New Times of July 26. It criticized the White Paper for a "lack of vision." It is safe to assume that many RCs (as well as many Protestants) do not agree with the opinions that are expressed here. We quote the following paragraphs:

The technical shortcomings of the White Paper aside, what is a major concern to many is that this document does nothing to make the world a safer place to live. The tensions which exist between the various opposing camps of our world are increased by this document.

Our young men of the hour, Prime Minister Mulroney and Defence Minister Beatty, are no visionaries. Calling themselves sober and pragmatic men, they have opted to follow the American way blindly and add to the cauldron of world tension rather than courageously and imaginatively put into place a Canadian plan for world peace which can begin the return to a peaceful approach to our considerable world difficulties.

There is no vision here. No moral courage. No inner strength. Just a tired decision to follow age-old paths that have, in the past, led nowhere but to the grave.

Where we have established ourselves as a military "power" has been our role as peacekeepers for the United Nations. Here our contributions to a safer world have been out of proportion to our size. Indeed, we are actively sought out by the world community for this role. Yet this important contribution of our military is given mere lip service in the White Paper.

Our leaders have decided, with this Defence White Paper, to remain on the unimaginative path of arms escalation which can lead nowhere but to an eventual war. This is an ignoble path to walk for a nation with so much to give.

The new party

The Christian Heritage Party of Canada was discussed in the June issue of The Messenger magazine of the Free Reformed Church, by the editor Rev. A. Baars. He sees the emergence of this new party as a very important development in our society, is thankful for it and supports it. He also makes some observations. In the first place he does not share the idea, expressed in Canadian Reformed circles, that the Reformed confessions must be included in the basic principles of the party.

In the church we are united by the Three Forms of Unity and every Reformed Christian has bound himself to live accordingly. This should quite naturally come through in all the areas of his life. However, there is no reason why we should not work together with Christians of a different persuasion in common social and political concerns. In these areas our own confessional stand will show itself — and we certainly do not have to be ashamed of this! — but we should not impose the adherence to our confessional standards as a condition for co-operation in a Christian political organization.

In the second place the editor has some problems with the objectives of the party.

At this point the question comes up: What really is the primary objective? Is it to attain power? It is possible that I am reading too much in the order of these articles, but should the party's first concern not be to make known and defend biblical principles in the political arena? In my opinion the primary objective of a Christian political party is to call back government and society to the teaching of the Word of God.

Christians and AIDS

In Mennonite Brethren Herald of July 17 we found a good article of John H. Redekop on the spread of AIDS. He seeks an answer to the question of what the response of Christians should be to this horrible disease, and he comes to the following conclusions which every Christian should take to heart:

Christian responses to this sudden scourge vary from treating it as if it were just another unfortunate natural phenomenon, like Legionnaire's Disease, to insisting that it constitutes God's "last days" judgment on contemporary Sodom and Gomorrah.

Perhaps the appropriate response lies somewhere between the two. None of us can read God's mind. We do not know why this plague has struck now. What we do know is that ultimately the wages of sin is death, which, by the atoning work of Jesus has been set aside for those who believe and generally postponed for those who don't.

We also know that the law of cause and effect applies to sin. That is why 33,000 Canadians died last year from tobacco-related causes, and that is why AIDS victims die. When society condones what God condemns, there is a price to pay. God's standards cannot be broken with impunity.

In the years ahead the Christian church in Canada and elsewhere will be put to a very great test. As the AIDS plague reaches monumental proportions and touches us in our communities and even our families, we need to think hard and to speak carefully. Of course we must teach and model sexual abstinence outside of marriage and reject all unnatural sex. But will we merely condemn those who by their deeds have brought death unto themselves or will we still be sufficiently Christ-like to love the sinner even as we condemn sin? Will we remember that Christ died for us precisely because we all deserved to die because of who we were and what we had done?

Christian babies

The War Cry of July 18 notes that there are too many babies in our society. It means to say that we have too many adolescents who mature at least 10 years later than their parents' generation: "They have got used to living irresponsible lives. They seek the easier way." It would be foolish to think that the Christian Church has escaped this malaise.

What is the subject matter of most of the Christian books now flooding the market? The majority of them are self-centred, problem-oriented: how to deal with your depression, your spouse's unfaithfulness, your obesity, your rotten complexion, your gossiping neighbour, the officer (or minister) you don't like ... the list appears to be endless.

Such a diet is producing malnourished Christians; spiritual babies who sit at the centre of their own personal universe screaming for attention, never getting beyond their problems. And they will never, so long as they keep looking at themselves, so long as their horizons are self-interest and self-glory.

God expects his people to grow up and to take responsibility for their lives. He has provided the means of grace. Never have more Bibles been available — in a bewildering welter of translations and with study guides galore — and never has there been more biblical illiteracy.

The Christian life is lived by faith, not by feeling, yet most Christians — and certainly all Christian babies — think the reverse is true, to their spiritual loss.

It is a sign of the times that most of the articles on Christian living which arrive at The War Cry refer to "feeling the presence of God," "feeling saved," rather than stating: "I know I am saved," or, "I know the presence of the Lord."

This is more than a sloppy use of language (though that is definitely increasing), it is a shift of perception from faith to feeling. And that is guaranteed to keep Christians in babyhood long past the time when they should have matured in the faith.

Are you a spiritual infant? Start living — by faith; claim God's promises — by faith; believe what He says — by faith. And refuse to accept your self-centred, introverted feelings as the basis for your spiritual health. Only then will you have a message of healing hope for the lost of your generation.

Christian schools in Australia:

A growing trans-denominational movement (1)

Harro Van Brummelen

Almost 200 students gather in an outdoor space between the classroom buildings for “parade,” the daily assembly in a Queensland, Australia, Christian school. All are neatly dressed, in attractive uniforms, with appropriate hats to keep off the cancer-inducing rays of the sun. After some choruses, prayer and the inevitable announcements, the principal, in shorts and sportshirt, asks me to help congratulate all students who have birthdays during the forthcoming June winter vacation. I gladly comply, although I’m too bashful a Canadian to follow his example and give each girl a birthday kiss!

Afterwards, the students quickly disperse to their classes in one of the seven separate building “blocks” scattered about the property. The “hallways” are sidewalks between the blocks. Each building is the width of a classroom, and each room has outside doors at opposite sides. Many schools have their buildings arranged in quadrangles, enhancing a “town square” community atmosphere.

At the elementary levels, I saw a great deal of exciting, creative, Christ-centred learning. In one large Grade 5/6 class, self-motivated students worked individually or in small groups on well-structured units emphasizing Christian themes. However, as in North America, secondary teaching seemed dominated by textbook-based “teacher talk.” But these teachers too, wanted help in structuring their classes and content according to biblical norms.

Christian outreach centre

For three weeks in June I was the guest of Christian Outreach Centre (COC) in Brisbane, Queensland. COC, begun as an evangelistic outreach ministry a dozen years ago, is now the largest church congregation in Australia. Today up to 3,000 persons worship each Sunday morning in a large but simple building, and the mother church has spawned 95 others throughout Queensland and the rest of Australia.

COC’s vision goes beyond worship and evangelism, however. Among many other ventures, it operates Christian schools, including a 600-student school in Brisbane. It has also begun the first pre-service Christian teacher training institution in Australia. The 20-student college is so new that it still has no permanent name! But it is functioning, with a staff of four full-time and several part-time instructors. Head of the teacher training program is Bob Pearson, well-known in British Columbia for his church, Bible College and Christian school work.

Groupings of Christian schools

Christian schools have grown rapidly in Australia during the last decade. There are four main groups. The largest, the National Union of Christian Parent-Controlled Schools (NU) has its origins in Reformed circles. Today, its teachers and 10,000 students come from a wide range of evangelical backgrounds. These schools have generally broken through the Dutch ethnic barrier more successfully than their North American counterparts in Christian Schools International (CSI).

The second group, the Christian Community Schools (CCS), has more schools than the NU and a “total enrolment of 8,000 students. Most of these schools are operated by individual church congregations, many of Baptist persuasion. Rapidly expanding, this group takes its cues especially from Paul’s writings in Ephesians about Christian community. The group spends a great deal of effort in helping people in classrooms and schools form truly Christian learning communities.

The third group of Christian schools is the non-affiliated ones. Charismatic churches have begun most of these during the past 10 years. The fourth group consists of 800-odd small Accelerated Christian Education (ACE) schools. These, I was told, have stopped growing because of their one-sided programmed learning methods and American orientation.

All Christian schools except the ACE ones are seeking to co-operate with each other. In Sydney I spoke to a regular full-day meeting of the NU and CCS principals’ association attended by about 30 people. In Brisbane, I was the resource person at a conference that also established an association of Christian school principals in Queensland. While here the majority represented schools operated by charismatic churches, CCS and NU principals also attended and endorsed this new organization. Discussions have begun to appoint a part-time curriculum co-ordinator in Queensland similar to the Canadian CSI-district model. There have also been informal initiatives to establish a national umbrella organization for all Christian schools, something that regrettably does not seem to be possible in Canada.

Curriculum projects

As in Canada, curriculum work is a priority for Australian Christian schools. Christian Community Schools, under Bob Frisken’s direction, have taken a leading role in this area. Sensing the need for Christian reading materials, for instance, CCS has published a series of undated “Christian School Magazines” with reading material, some written by students, to supplement secular reading books. While its publications catalogue is extensive, its work has not benefited from the careful editing that, for instance, CSI Publications gives its materials. The movement is yet young!

Individual NU schools have also developed units and course outlines that are used by schools other than their own. For instance, Sydney’s Wycliffe Christian School has developed an excellent “Man in God’s World” integrated Bible-social studies-science curriculum for grades 1-6. The National Union recently appointed its first educational co-ordinator, Nick Hart. He will be responsible for the organization’s curriculum projects. Many Christian schools use North American Christian school textbooks, including ones published by CSI. But the schools realize that they need to develop materials particularly suited to the Australian scene. That is why, for instance, COC and CCS co-sponsored a curriculum course I taught to 120 Christian school teachers from various parts of Queensland and northern New South Wales.

Next issue: I will discuss government relations and teacher training for Christian schools. I will also compare the Canadian and Australian scenes.

Letter to a friend

In this letter, Hendrik Hart writes to Nicholas Wolterstorff about the book Lament for A Son. Published in June of this year by Eerdmans in Grand Rapids, this 111-page book contains short pieces Wolterstorff wrote to honour his son Eric, who died in a mountain-climbing accident four years ago. Hart felt that the intimate character of the book and his own friendship with Wolterstorff made a regular review of this book inappropriate. Hence, the letter, as a more fitting way to share with the readers of Calvinist Contact the content of this unusual and very beautiful book of mourning and remembrance. The book sells for $9.95. Wolterstorff is a philosopher who teaches at Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Michigan, and at the Free University of Amsterdam. Hart, also a philosopher, teaches at the Institute for Christian Studies in Toronto.

Dear Nick,
When I first heard about your Lament, I had very mixed emotions around reading it. I know your power with words. So I felt some fear around the hurt and sorrow you'd be able to set loose in me. But because I love you as a good friend, I also sensed how right it would be to share your grief with you from the pages of a book. For I have always experienced your pages as places where you dwell, sometimes even intensely. Now I am grateful that I spent a day reading along with you. It was a hot day, and it felt somewhat like the day Eric was buried.

I hope you don't mind that I write you like this, in public. I could not get myself to compose a review. Somehow that felt crude, an unwelcome untrusion into intimacy, a translation of poetry into the clinical prose of a formula. But to write personally to you and then, like you did in the book, to let others read along, that seemed less awkward. For I do want to let others know about your Lament. I hope many people will read these awesome words that are now resting places for heart-felt suffering, telling memorials of genuine God-felt pain.

I know that often when an author lets go of a manuscript there can be a feeling of risk. It becomes public property. Sometimes that feels like what I hear mothers describe as the blues after birth. You've had it close to you. But now everybody can call it theirs because they paid for it. People can touch it with love and respect. They can also take it and hurt you with it. How much more is the risk when you let go of a manuscript which itself is a letting go. You give up the safety of being sole owner of your intimate moments of faith and doubt, of your very private sorrow and anger, of your abiding source of comfort wrapped around a grief that will always mark your life. And how much, much more vulnerable do you become when you share letting go of yourself in the death of your son. I hear you saying that perhaps Eric came closer as you had to let go. But you left yourself behind. And now you share with all of us the words God helped you find to point towards what none can tell. Well, thank you, Nick!

What overwhelmed me more than anything was: it's real. The words let the suffering be real. I can feel the courage you must have needed to let your own words give shape to that reality and to let it be there as it is. An important part of that reality for me was its being there before God's face and in God's grace and even then so ugly, so destructive, so unbearable yet borne.

Surely He has borne ... Surely you have borne, too. He in you, you through him. He through you on these public pages a little more for all of us.

How grateful I am for a love strong enough to let Eric have his faults. And yes, such love loses the son so loved only with pain never ending. I felt it was this love that let you so completely and uniquely be yourself in your words. You tell your own incomparable humanity so authentically human that in these same words you become like all of us. So we can ourselves feel and recognize the reality of suffering, pain, love and comfort. And at the same time we can feel how it is incomparable. We feel our own pain. Yours only you can feel. But you compassionately hand us our own. And we help you bear yours.

Your experience of death makes living come alive more and the feel of God's presence more real. The Abstract God of Philosophy, the Unmoving and Unchanging Divinity of our philosophical tradition, is not present in your book. It is as though, in a moving way, you atone for the influence we philosophers have had on the historic faith of our church. In your suffering God becomes visible as the co-sufferer, the compassionate one.

I can see God sit on your patio, hearing the piercing shrill sound of the elusive cicada call for a mate when the heat is hot as it was the day Eric was buried, intently looking at the robust jade whose sturdy dignity tells of a solid creation, then looking your way and starting to talk to you: "Nick, philosopher, my confession may be hard on you. Perhaps later you'll understand, when certain theological traditions no longer interfere to let me be me. But now I must tell you this, son. There's little I can do and to pray, an invitation to feel deeply, an occasion for experiencing something new which resonates with an old and trusted sense of reality. I think people who are now mourning will be grateful when someone buys them your book. And people pastoring mourners, or people who feel awkward about what to say to a mourner, or people who are not sure they did the right thing, all will find your shared glimpses into your sorrow helping them dare to touch grief.

I was also touched by the movement of your mourning. Slowly it widens, pulses beyond Eric to find the heartbeat of all who suffer. Your suffering in simply experience it, your comforting Lament came to us. "It was for a purpose," they'll say, not without feeling.

I share the chill that runs down your spine. Your experience of being found by a God who resists all death and who weeps that by us came death anyway is not yet widely shared. I understand your anger at this age-old reading of the will of God. Yet I hope you will, having felt the compassionate God come into your presence, be able to represent this vulnerable creator gently to those who are more secure with death included in God's will. Some of the things we learn to give up we can then more easily accept in others. And, as you said, we grieve so differently. Hence, I guess, the differences in our comfort.

I'd like to share one more of my many experiences while reading the book. You also were so much still the philosopher. Thank you for that, too! Truth could hardly be presented by a philosopher more truly than in Lament for a Son.

Though this letter is to you, because you are the author of the book, I find it impossible to end without saying something to Claire and also to Amy, Robert, Klaas and Christofer. I really hope that in the dedication of this book to you, Nick's unavoidable isolation from you in his grief, as well as your being separate from him in your own sorrowing selves, will now speak of deeper bonds of love. Love that lets be, love that trusts even when bridges break and only wild, destructive currents join shore to shore. The shores are like peace and justice. They know they will embrace.

I must close now. Thank you for this act of communion. Your proclamation of the deadliness of death and of the victory of a love willing to suffer death will comfort many.

Friend, I love you more now. Grim growth!? Sadly, yes. But also a way our tears of mourning run over into oil of gladness.

for you right now. Later, but not now. Sorry, but I can't. That's the way it is for me. You want Eric now. I understand. Your son slid down a mountain alone. Mine was hoisted aloft on a hill in a crowd. Both felt forsaken by me." God sobs: "Nick, I'm sorry!"

I am moved by this vision of God so real in your book. And moved, too, by seeing you sit there. You are pale, worn. You lean backward, testing this God from a distance, hands locked behind your head. Then you break and lunge forward. You, child, accept God's lament. You sob too. Your hands reach out. I can see you move over to hug God and weep "thank you."

Actually, on almost every page of your Lament I find a call to meditate and to see visions, an urge to speak to God solitude grows into compassion. Then you touch back in with the grave of your own son again. And your sorrow seems to become softer as it archs back into life after it began with the hardness of a body that was not only cold but also rigid.

Some mourners will read your book in the simple tradition of an old faith. They will find solace in the knowledge that now they understand why Eric died. These fellow grievors have been taught to seek comfort in the knowledge that God wanted Eric and all others who die. But now, after reading your book, they may think they now also understand better how this is. They feel unburdened and even touched to see that Eric's death was, must be, the divinely wise road along which, as they

A banquet in the valley of the shadow of life sentences

Bert Witvoet

My wife Alice and I have gone to family conferences, special services and other spiritual festivities, but this was the first time we would enter prison to attend a gospelfest. Outside Collins Bay Institution Alice counted the blocks that made up the formidable walls surrounding the complex of prison facilities. They went up 20-some feet, we estimated. A guard pulled up alongside us in a van; wondered why we were so interested in the walls. Strange notion of his. Alice and I had not yet gone around them seven times.

Once we had passed through two electric doors and two iron gates, we were told to leave our valuables and money in a locker, and we had to pass through a metal detector. This they call a medium security prison!

Meeting Dube

As we walked across a courtyard, we were greeted by Ron Dube, the inmate organizer of Gospelfest '87. It was our first meeting. Ron had written a few things for Calvinist Contact and we had corresponded. I wasn't even sure about the pronunciation of his last name — Dube, Dube, Dubie? It was Dube as in lube. Everyone there calls him Dube too, instead of Ron.

It was a gloriously sunny day and the chapel soon filled up with some 90 inmates and 140 guests. Dube had seen to it that Alice and I were seated at the same table as Grada Lieverdink, the 82-year-old author of The Open Door. Grada had begun to write to Ron, after his name and address had appeared in Calvinist Contact. "You are lonely," she had written to Ron. "I am lonely too." She told him how she had lost her husband and two sons. But the Lord had sustained her. "Maybe you had to be in prison to find Jesus," she wrote to Ron.

Ron, who by this time was a Christian, really appreciated Grada's letters. He read her book and thought that she was a very special lady. So special, in fact, that he and his committee of organizers decided to make Grada the first recipient of the "Gospelfest Good Samaritan Award." The presentation took Grada completely by surprise, but nevertheless, she was able to give an impromptu speech and testimony that brought her close to the heart of her audience.

No merit, no condemnation

It's well nigh impossible for me to give an account of all the things that took place at the Gospelfest that day. Someone "from the outside" opened the day with a bagpipe rendition of "Amazing Grace."

"If it weren't for God's grace, none of us would be here, and none of us would know about God," said Dube. He was so right. And to hear these words spoken by a man who has served nine years and has 16 more to go makes you wonder about the power of that grace — simply amazing.

"Where there is grace, there can be no obligation and no merit," Pastor Rice of the Congregational Mission Church told us. That explains it, I guess. But it's still amazing because, whereas Grace says,

"You are forgiven," everything in prison speaks condemnation. The sentence, the walls, the guards, even the fellow inmates create a spirit of condemnation. And yet there are people like Ron Dube and Larry ... I'll tell you about Larry later.

The church in chains

A second pastor, George Jenkins, really started things moving. He is one of those pacing creatures who punctuates his sermon with plenty of hallelujahs and praise-the-Lords. And he has reason to.

He himself had been released from a federal penitentiary earlier this year. "But," he told us, "there are stronger prisons outside these walls. They are human hearts locked up in loneliness."

Being an ex-con, Jenkins could connect with his prison audience. "Miracles took place in these institutions," he said. "During the day we played tough, but at night there was pain and hurt. The miracle happened when a prisoner had enough guts to say, 'I have a need.' Jesus took the rap for us; He's that solid friend you've been waiting for."

I looked around. Quite a few of the prisoners had committed themselves to Jesus, I was told. From 40 to 50. That is amazing grace, isn't it? At Collins Bay there are only 500 prisoners. Almost 10 per cent are brothers in the Lord. That's a higher percentage than on the other side of the wall! Statistically speaking, the Church of Jesus Christ does better in captivity than in freedom.

There were also prisoners in attendance who were more curious than committed. They were looking for a distraction. Life can be boring in prison. Would they be gripped by this testimony of one of them?

Cautiously converted

Larry, 43, came to the front for a brief account of life in jail for the past 20 years. Larry has served 22 years in numerous institutions. He was part of three armed robberies, tried to escape seven times. He's been politically active in jail, trying to fight for prisoner's rights. His arms show a grid of slash marks from a protest done in a U.S. jail.

Larry knew Roger Carron, the author of Go Boy. They used to go over Roger's manuscript, never believing that it would become a book some day. Prisoners don't believe much about themselves. That's one of their problems — not believing that they can make it in the outside world.

According to Larry, life at Collins Bay is a lot better than in a U.S. jail. Today again is better than the sixties. He explained how he had to get used to shaking hands and being hugged by his fellow Christian inmates. It was dangerous to shake someone's hand or hug him in a U.S. jail, he pointed out.

Larry is a cautious Christian. He had to overcome feelings of awkwardness about praying and carrying a Bible. "It's hard to be a Christian in jail," he confessed. But, like Dube, he comes across as a man who has come to terms with his past and is determined that the new way of Christ is far better than anything he has ever attempted before.

But there's one thing he can't stand very well, and that is phoney Christianity. It's something no prisoner tolerates for that matter. Once you say you're a Christian in jail, you had better mean it. Larry believes too that Christianity is for all of life — politics, labour, education.

Bielby was all right

Perhaps the highlight of the Gospelfest that day proved to be the testimony of Salvation Army Captain Peter Bielby from Montreal. Bielby is a burley character with the no-nonsense demeanor of an army sergeant. Turned out he was once a convict too. Twenty years ago he graduated from Collins Bay Penitentiary, and he was none too happy about being back in the place if even for a morning and as a speaker.

"It's painful," he told his audience. "I never wanted to see the place again." In fact, this was the first time he told his story about life in prison and afterwards. Even his wife, who was there and had just sung a song for us, had not heard him tell his story before. Talk about a captivated (no pun intended) audience!

Bielby was tough in his criminal days. He liked nothing better than to pick a fight or get the guards to throw him in the hole. It was an insult to him to be moved from Kingston penitentiary, a maximum security place, to Collins Bay. It hurt his reputation.

He used to come to weekly chapel, he told us, not because he was interested in religion, but it provided him with an opportunity to shoot crap or play the numbers in the back pews. In those days Major and Mrs. Ivan Jackson of the Salvation Army led chapel services in Collins Bay. One day though, Bielby had had enough of all that preaching, and he yelled to the front whether Jackson could talk about anything else but Jesus.

One of the guards had it in for Bielby. He pulled him aside and told Jackson not to worry. "This guy won't be back here again." Jackson looked at the guard, and said, "Leave him alone. He's all right."

God did it

That statement was to haunt Peter Bielby for a long time. How come Jackson had said that he was all right? No one had ever told him before that he was all right. Bielby began to pay more attention to what Jackson was saying. He said to himself, Jackson is happy and I am not. He remembers praying, "God whatever you gotta do, do it." To his surprise, after that prayer, he found himself tolerating other people instead of hating them, as he had done before.

He studied the Bible in order to find questions that would stump Mr. and Mrs. Jackson. Mrs. Jackson would always say, "We'll pray about it." Bielby figured that meant she didn't know the answer.

At any rate, Bielby eventually got turned on to the Christian faith. He did not become, as he terms it, "religious." But something inside him changed. Not only that, Bielby decided he wanted to become a Salvation Army officer.

He was told that he needed to get a Grade 12 education and have $3,000 in the bank to show that he could manage his life. This was no mean challenge for Bielby who had only managed to enter Grade six. As a ward of the Children's Aid his education had been neglected. Farmers would use him for work well into October. Teachers would pass him on, not wanting to have him back in class the next year. Whatever Bielby had learned about life had been pretty much in spite of school.

After a few years Bielby returned to the Salvation Army recruiting office with his Grade 12 diploma in one hand and his bankbook showing $3,000 in the other. But he was still not acceptable. Bielby went higher up and told the interviewing officer that he was not leaving until the matter was settled. When the officer told him he could not meet with Bielby, that he had to attend a meeting, he was told that he was not going anywhere and they were going to pray about it. "I had learned that from Mrs. Jackson," he told his Collins Bay audience.

His speech and testimony over, the inmates lead us in a standing ovation. You could tell that his brusque but honest testimony had made an impact on them. Here was one of them who had made it in the outside world, and he made no phoney claims for himself. His former macho attitude and skepticism, though still visible under the surface of his new life, had surrendered to the gentle love of the Saviour represented by Mr. and Mrs. Ivan Jackson.

Non-religious music

The program was spiced with song and testimony by The Goodberry Sisters, Mrs. Myna Rice, Glen Bonham of the Circle Square Ranch and Peter Bielby's wife. Except for Glen Bonham's contribution, most songs were traditional and a little too sweet for the setting, I thought.

Glen Bonham's music was original and non-religious in the sense that Bielby had meant it. Bonham himself talked about being spiritual but not religious. I think it's a these guests that their presence is needed on other days when activities like Gospelfest are not happening. It is good for outside and inside people to get together and celebrate what God has given us, but it is also necessary for us to get together and help each other in the rough times. Christianity is not a continuous celebration. There is work and needs that have to be addressed. We inside and those outside have to come together and work at removing the walls. Gospelfest is a beautiful experience, but if we don't share that experience with others, it becomes empty."

Ron himself turned to the Lord on Feb. 11, 1982. He had asked a lot of questions before that, but was eventually distinction the Church of Christ outside the prison walls should take note of. It probably means that the religious trappings and jargon fall away, and the surprising reality of life in Christ emerges, fresh like the playful and contemporary songs of Bonham.

Visiting Jesus

Ron Dube had reasons to feel satisfied about the outcome of the seventh Gospelfest in Collins Bay. "The purpose of these events is to plant some seeds in the prison population," he told me afterwards. "To show the guys that you don't need to be drunk or stoned or bad to have fun. The fact that the outside guests are invited is meant to show them that we are normal people. God is here."

"But the Gospelfest is not meant to give the impression that this is what jail is like. The Gospelfest is a special day. Also we hope to plant seeds in convinced that something in his life was totally wrong. Accepting Jesus Christ did not change his 25-year sentence, he said, "but I don't have to serve it alone."

As I was listening to Dube, the reality of one of Jesus' statements suddenly hit me — "I was in prison, and you did or did not visit me." I remember debating with someone about this text. Did it mean that everyone in prison was Jesus? My debating friend said, "yes." I now know that the answer is not so simple.

No, it does not mean everyone. Jesus is present in people like Dube and Larry and Houston and Robby, in a very concrete way. But he may end up living in the heart of any prisoner, even in the heart of John who claims to be an atheist, and who was playfully tricked into shouting hallelujah while one of the inmates pushed up his hand. How long is John going to hold out?

Visiting John may well turn into visiting Jesus. And so the question really becomes an academic one, and has no value in guiding us as to whom we should visit in jail.

The pain of conversion

Ron Dube was a non-believing prisoner at one time. Now he hopes to become the first man to be ordained a minister of the gospel while serving out his 25-year sentence. Let's see what church is ready for that one!

Being a Christian has not removed painful experiences from Dube's life. Once he accepted Jesus Christ to come into his life, things didn't turn into an overnight success story. He shared parts of an experience which had left him feeling totally abandoned. His wife left him and aborted his baby. His health deteriorated and he lost 63 pounds. He felt he was dying. His trust in people sank low and he even began name-calling God. But for some strange reason he told himself every day, "Don't forget to say thanks to God at 11 o'clock at night."

Eleven p.m. is when the prisoners must return to their cells. That's when they feel very alone and helpless. That's when the night begins, the time when courage grows dim and power games lose their effectiveness.

Ron is glad he became a Christian. But he hopes and prays that he'll never have to experience what he calls the worst time of his life again. Now when he speaks to other prisoners, he tells them up front that being a Christian does not mean that there will never be bad times, especially when 11 o'clock rolls around, and the time to be alone is there. "I don't try to erase the hurts of these places by painting a false picture with Christianity. Most of these guys have had enough head games laid on them. So I tell them the truth about there being good and bad times being a Christian."

In his "Snowflake" diary, parts of which we shared with C.C. readers a year ago, he wrote as introduction: "Twenty-five poems/of wrongs painful tears/ is easier to read/ than doing twenty-five years."

Another entry in his diary drives home the loneliness that these prisoners must face: "Oct. 30, 1985, 10:56 p.m. [four minutes before the cell is locked] Sweet Jesus, hold me tight, on this cold and lonely night. Take my mind, and allow me peace. I'll trade anyone all of my tomorrows for one today's peace of mind. If you ever read these words then you understand my thoughts. I miss so much. A soft kitten, a walk with a dog. It totally freaks me out when I hear people saying that we have it too easy.

"When I die, I'll go to heaven
Because I've done my time in hell ...

"So I end another day.
Another part of my life. One less than the day before. Allow peace in my sleep, sweet Lord. Show me some pretty pictures, and make tomorrow's beginning with a smile."

Most nights for prisoners are filled with the same thoughts expressed in these entries. It is from this pain that Dube attempts to share about Jesus with his fellow prisoners.

Only a glimpse

The reality of prison life is given a glimpse in these writings by Dube. The visit too helped Alice and myself get a very small, even unrealistic taste of life behind walls.

We got served large cups of ice cream with strawberries after our lunch. But lest one thinks that this represents life in prison, we heard that Larry tried to bring a cup to one of his fellow inmates who had not signed up for the Gospelfest. A guard turned him back. That act of kindness was not permitted. The very fact that he had made his promise told us that this was a very special treat for the men.

And to think that Jesus is there too. And He doesn't get a lot of ice cream there either. Larry had said that he was going to be part of an attempt to have prisoners obtain the right to vote in the Sept. 10 Ontario elections. Jesus would like to vote too, I imagine. But Jesus, like Dube and Larry, submits to what the will of the Father is in these things.

When Alice and I left the prison, having passed once again through gates and electric doors, we commented on the fact that prisons offer no horizons. The sky is there, but so are those immovable, fortress-like walls. We noticed that the birds felt free to fly over and in, over and out. Prisoners must envy those birds, we said.

The irony of grace

But then we kept thinking back to the stronger walls of the human heart, and the fact that God is in jail and outside of jail, and that his "free" servants come and visit faithfully the "locked-up" servants. And we weren't so sure anymore about the invincibility of prison walls.

But we didn't walk around the complex seven times. The truth always comes out at the wall, Ron had written in one of his diary entries. And we had no business trying to rebel against the fact that crime needs to be punished, except that we wondered why our crimes against God and humankind were not punished this way. The arm of the law is a very dull instrument of justice. It certainly makes a mess of separating the sheep from the goats.

Both of us felt strangely enriched as we walked back to the car ... as if we had feasted at a table in the presence of some enemy. Was that enemy the unbelieving guards and unbelieving prisoners we knew were there in the background? Or was it the walls with rolls of barbed wire? Never mind; we had feasted, and Goodness and Mercy had been there too, surely. Goodness had shown itself in the changed life of prisoners and Mercy was written all over the faces of the souls walking around in the hall and sitting down at picnic tables. Unexpected Goodness and Undeserved Mercy. Cousins of Amazing Grace, I guess.

Thanks, Dube. I have been praying for you guys around 11 o'clock at night.

Cathedrals on canvas

Painting: Wilhelmina Kennedy
Kennedy's paintings: symbolic representations of cathedrals. Left: Wilhelmina Kennedy tries to instil a feeling of reverence and awe for God's majesty in her works.

Alice Vander Vennen
"This looks like a church," exclaims the woman wearing the red sundress. She is looking at one of Wilhelmina Kennedy's paintings on display in the Latcham Gallery in Stouffville, Ontario, July 9-31. Although the painting is not a realistic representation of a building as such, it is an abstract, symbolic representation of a cathedral. In fact, any one of the paintings on display might remind one of cathedrals or large beautiful worship buildings.
The theme of the series of paintings is worship. Each large canvas has a wonderful array of smooth subtle areas of colour juxtaposed with a textured surface made up of paper cardboard or even, tinfoil. Large areas are defined by tall vertical lines. The work has been carefully done and one cannot help but see that Kennedy loves to paint.

Cathedrals inspire reverence
Inspired by the architectural wonder of the European cathedrals, Kennedy began the first of her series shortly after returning home from a trip to The Netherlands. The cathedrals themselves, their mere structure, instil in one the sense of God's majesty. Kennedy explained that while standing in the cathedrals she was struck by a feeling of reverence. The verse "be still and know that I am God" came to mind.

Looking at her work, one can see that Kennedy has captured in our time and culture that sense of awe and silence. Tall vertical lines and arches reaching for the heavens in cathedral architecture are symbolized in her paintings. The large spaces on her canvas help to depict God's majesty.

According to Kennedy, modern artists, like their counterparts throughout history, react to society at large. She speaks of herself reacting to the worship of today. "Where is that awe for God in our worship?", she asks. She talks of not finding it in any of the physical surroundings of worship, and not always in the worship service itself. She makes the point that God instituted worship as very symbolic. This can be seen in the Old Testament account of the structure of the temple. Strict instructions were given for the visual and structural aspects of worship as well as the service itself. She speaks of the importance of having more visual symbolic aspects to our worship. It is the Christian artist's task to show something that is visual rather than verbal.

Looking at her work, one can see that she takes that task seriously.

Deep sense of history

Kennedy says of her work that the theme and paintings themselves give her a sense of belonging. Her own great-grandfather was buried right in the church, and her grandfather, father and now she and her children continue to go to church to worship. The sense of belonging to God's people reaches back deep into the generations.
This connects with a comment an art critic made upon seeing the show. "This work has a sense of history," he said. Each painting shows Kennedy's awareness of the history of art. The work itself takes its place in that history.
The show was on display also at Redeemer College during the fall of 1986.

Alice Vander Vennen is an artist and art teacher at Durham Christian High School, Bowmanville, Ontario.

Herring down your throat

This scene at the 1985 Netherlands Bazaar can be repeated with you holding the herring or looking on. Visit The Netherlands Bazaar on Saturday, October 24 in the Thornhill Community Centre on 7755 Bayview Ave., Thornhill (just north of Toronto). Enjoy delicious foods, beautiful handcrafts, gift items, baked goods, books, flowers and plants.

Every penny earned at this bazaar goes toward helping families of Dutch extraction in dire financial need. Food parcels, financial aid and summer camp have been offered over the past two years at an expense of $61,000.

You can donate baked goods or merchandise by calling Ge Spaans (416) 477-1243 or Bets Speelman (416) 742-1172.

Help us raise $70,000 to continue the work over the next two years.

In the process of choosing which of various series of crossword puzzles the paper would use, Marguerite Witvoet and I had the pleasant task of "doing" various puzzles and deciding which were most suitable. (What a way to spend one's first hours back at work after a six month absence!)

We chose this series because we liked its blend of cultural, "pop" cultural, literary, geographical, and day-to-day life allusions — it doesn't require extensive knowledge in any one field.

We hope you enjoy it as we did.

Als je 't mij vraagt ...

Syrt Wolters

Wat is de opdracht: infiltratie, insulatie of isolatie?

Hoe moet de Christelijke gemeenschap in de wereld haar plaats innemen en haar taak vervullen? Op welke manier moet dat gebeuren?

Moeten we als eenlingen, een ieder in zijn eigen hoekje, proberen invloed uit te oefenen? Dat is "infiltratie," hebben we gezegd. Of is elke bemoeienis met de "wereld" voor de Christelijke gemeenschap contrabande? Moeten we naar "van vreemde smetten vrij" ons afzijdig houden van alles wat maar naar "de wereld" ruikt? Natuurlijk moet een rasechte Calvinist daar niets van hebben. Dat strijdt wel heel grondig met het a-b-c van het Calvinisme. Dus geen infiltratie en geen insulatie!

Wat overblijft is isolatie?

Een olievlek

Wat is isolatie? Wat is het verschil tussen "insulatie" en "isolatie"? De woorden lijken veel op elkaar, maar toch is er een grondig verschil. Insulatie, hebben we uitgevonden, is te vergelijken met materiaal dat elektrische stroom veilig verbergt binnen een kabel van rubber. Er is totaal geen contact met de buitenwereld. Insulatie gebruiken we ook om de kou buitenshuis te houden (en de hitte).

Isolatie is heel wat anders. Het is te vergelijken met een plas olie op het water. Olie blijft op het water drijven; het vermengt zich niet met het water, ook al is het aan alle zijden blootgesteld aan dat water. Het heeft contact, een zo groot mogelijk contact met de "omgeving," zonder zich te vermengen met de omgeving. Het heeft een "bestaan" op zichzelf.

En dat, geloof ik, is een duidelijk beeld hoe de Christelijke gemeenschap in de wereld moet leven, werken en getuigen.

De Christelijke gemeenschap, dat is de gemeenschap der heiligen, waarvan we gelovig belijden in de Apostolische Geloofsbelijdenis, en waar ook artikel 27 van de Nederlandse Geloofsbelijdenis van spreekt. Dat is die gemeenschap, door Christus verlost uit de macht van satan, en weer geroepen om het burgerschap van het Koninkrijk Gods te beleven, zoals Adam daartoe geroepen was in het paradijs. We moeten weer onze cultuurtaak in de wereld opnemen volgens de termen van het Koninkrijk Gods. En zoals het volk Israël zich geïsoleerd moest houden van de volken rondom, zo moet de gemeenschap der heiligen zich "isoleren" van de wereld. Dat wil zeggen dat de kerk van Christus (nu niet bedoeld als instituut, maar als lichaam van Christus, omvattend alle gelovigen) in de wereld bezig moet zijn als een zelfstandige eenheid, volgens de termen van God. En wat zijn die termen? Die worden ons voorgehouden in the Tien Geboden, waarvan de samenvatting is: Heb God lief boven alles en uw naaste als uzelf.

Dat is een erg simpele opdracht, maar de kerk heeft er door de eeuwen ontzettend veel moeite mee gehad. En dat heeft ze nog ...

Gevaarlijk werk

Enerzijds heeft de kerk daar moeite mee gehad, omdat ze altijd in de minderheid geweest is. Het leek vaak onbegonnen werk om in de wereld te zijn naar de voorwaarden van het Koninkrijk. Bovendien is zulk een burgerschap in de wereld uiterst gevaarlijk: Er vielen martelaren, als de kerk zich gehoorzaam gedroeg. Hoevelen zijn er niet door op de brandstapel gebracht of voor de wilde dieren geworpen! Nee, we hoeven heus niet te denken dat er een hemel op aarde zal komen als de Christenen hun geloof gaan beleven in de wereld. Integendeel!

Maar het is wel vaak onze drijfveer geweest om Christelijke actie te voeren. En als er met Christelijke actie niets bereikt kan worden, dan proberen we het op een andere manier. We gaan contacten zoeken en leggen met de wereld rondom ons en proberen om op de voorwaarden van de wereld een Christelijke invloed te zijn! Alsof dat onze taak is!

Succes de opdracht?

Dat is anderzijds ons probleem. We denken teveel dat we iets moeten bereiken in deze wereld, terwijl dat ons nooit opgedragen is. Jesus heeft Zijn kerk alleen maar opgedragen om getuigen te zijn; om de blijde boodschap van het Koninkrijk der hemelen te verkondigen met alles wat er aan vastzit. Jesus heeft nooit van ons gevraagd dat we succes moeten boeken. Dat is de verantwoordelijkheid van Jesus Christus zelf en Zijn Heilige Geest. Wij hoeven alleen maar gelovig en gehoorzaam te doen wat Hij ons bevolen heeft: In het geloof gehoorzaam zijn als burgers van Zijn Koninkrijk en op de voorwaarden van dat Koninkrijk.

Zodra we dat uit het oog verliezen; zodra we menen dat we diplomatiek en praktisch ons burgerschap moeten beleven, dan zijn we op weg om de kracht van het evangelie te verlammen. We verliezen onze "isolatie" en het duurt niet lang meer of er is van een olievlek op het water niet veel meer te bespeuren. De olie heeft haar eigengeaardheid verloren, en het zout is smakeloos geworden.

Het enige wat we gewonnen hebben is ons hachje: het leven wordt ons niet moeilijk gemaakt. Maar wat zei Jezus daar ook van? "Die zijn leven zal willen behouden, zal het verliezen, maar hij die bereid is om zijn leven te verliezen om Mij nentwil, zal het behouden!"

Kunnen wij u interesseren in moerasland, met een waarde van een biljoen dollars per jaar?

Canada's drassige gronden bieden aan het grootste gedeelte van Noord-Amerika's 45 miljoen eenden en andere watervogels een zomerverblijf — een waardebron van meer dan een biljoen dollars en jaarlijks een werkgelegenheid voor 40.000 mensen, door middel van tourisme en "wildlife" georiënteerde activiteiten.

Bovendien zijn de moerasgebieden een tehuis voor vele andere in het wild levende dieren en ook een belangrijke milieu buffer-zone ... waterhoudend, waarvan de omliggende gebieden kunnen profiteren en waardoor het wegvreten van de grond zal worden tegengehouden.

Het onfortuinlijke is, dat Canada's moerassen, vennen en drassige bosgronden het verliezen tegen de menselijke indringers.

De federale en provinciale regeringen hebben besloten tot het aanleggen van vogelbroedplaatsen en natuurreservaten voor het wild; 1.000 vierkante kilometers in totaal zijn nu beschermd gebied.

Maar er moet nog veel meer gedaan worden.

Om uit te vinden hoe belangrijk uw persoonlijke deelname hieraan kan zijn, kunt u contact opnemen met uw federale en provinciale "wildlife" of "natural resources" groep.

Bedenk dat een belegging van uw tijd en geld nu een ruime beloning zal verwerven in de toekomst van Canada.

Kommentaar met een knipoog

Herman de Jong

't Is een rare boel. Na 34 jaar denk je dat je nou toch werkelijk Canadees geworden bent en na een uur in Nederland geweest te zijn weet je dat het tegendeel waar is. Je bent ineens weer met handen en voeten aan Nederland gebonden.

Je voelt dat de natte Hollandse lucht jôu lucht is, dat de koeien en de sloten en de laag-rieten daken, de kerktorens aan het einde van de weilanden, de bruine zeilen op de Friese meren en de pronkerige Groninger boerenbehuizingen ... ach, zeg het nu maar ... ze behoren in zo grote mate tot je levenspatroon, dat zelfs de Rocky Mountains, de CN tower, en het uitzicht over Lake Ontario daar niet tegen op kunnen tornen.

Je zit in de Hooglandse kerk in Leiden 's morgens naar een organist te luisteren die aan het oefenen is. Je kijkt naar de hoge pilaren en vooral naar de zon, de zon die deze kerk zo sprankelend en toch wazig-licht maakt, en je denkt dat je dit al eens eerder hebt meegemaakt, in je eerste leven, zo rondom het jaar 1345 toen deze kerk vergroot werd tot wat ze nu is.

Je bent dat kleine jongetje dat z'n vader hielp specie te bereiden voor het metselwerk en je vriendjes gooien je met kleine stukjes rood steen en je gooit terug, maar ze ketsen tegen de zware muur waaraan je vader bouwt en blijven daar op de grond liggen tot in het jaar 1987, wanneer een 55-jarige man ze opdraagt.

In zijn handen houdt hij die eeuwenoude, onnozele, rode steentjes. Er zit nog wat witte specie aan en hij zal terug in Canada tegen zijn kleinzontje zeggen: kijk nou es, dit cement ... heb ik, heel lang geleden, voor mijn vader klaargemaakt. Ik mengde zand met grijze kalk, schepte het op een hoop, sloeg er een deuk in met mijn houten schop en vulde het dalletje met water. Dan gooiden vriendjes, die leuk wilden wezen, me met deze rode steentjes, en je grootvader heeft nu zo maar die steentjes weergevonden. Nu kunnen jongetjes nooit meer met steentjes naar hem gooien, want ze zitten in het sieradenkistje van Oma.

Hij zal er niets van begrijpen, die kleinzoon. Hij is ook nog maar drie en is een geboren Canadees. Nimmer zal hij op twee landen hinken. Dat is jammer! Want het is een spannende zaak.

Je zit naast je vrouw in de trein van Schiphol naar Leiden. 't Is maar een stap. Even buiten Amsterdam wordt je weer Nederlander. Een mestlucht dringt de trein binnen ... een boer heeft zijn gier over de weilanden verdeeld. Hij doet dit steeds als er een vliegtuig met Canadezen binnenkomt ... op last van de regering. Hij zal er waarschijnlijk voor betaald worden om oud-Hollanders weer honkvast te maken.

Nederland is een gek land. Nog zit het de regering dwars dat destijds zo veel prima vaderlanders het land hebben verlaten. Met groot genoegen snuif je die heerlijke gierlucht op en ineens neemt die onverklaarbare metamorphose plaats: van top tot teen voel je je weer Nederlander. Je wordt weer deel van het land dat evenveel koeien als mensen heeft en drie keer zoveel varkens. De lucht hunner uitwerpselen dringt het harte binnen van elke oud-emigrant op middelbare leeftijd en spijtig moet hij bekennen: dit heb ik nu zolang moeten missen.

Toch zal over een jaar of vijf de Hollandse lucht net zo zuiver en prikkend zijn als de Canadese lucht. Het gier vermengt zich met het grondwater. Je krijgt het in je kraan op de duur. Er gaan stemmen op die zeggen dat de regering niet helemaal verantwoord handelt om steeds maar weer boeren geld te betalen om hun landerijen en de neuzen van oud-emigranten te verkwikken. Lubbers krijgt op z'n kop. Lubbers zal ingrijpen want hij is een zeer verstandig iemand. Hij zal begrijpen dat hij Nederlands-Canadezen nooit meer terug krijgt om een weldadige verandering te scheppen in de politiek en het bedrijfsleven. Hij weet ook dat die kleine emigranten-familietjes zich flink hebben uitgebreid en dat kleinkinderen zitten te smachten om verhaaltjes uit Opa's of Oma's mond te horen ... verhaaltjes over een ver, ver, klein landje waar schapen en koeien en biggen en mensen genoeglijk samenwonen.

Ik ben al weer vroeg op die eerste morgen in Leiderdorp. Achter mijn zwagers huis is de wetering. Daar loop ik naar toe. Het miezert, maar vooruit. Om bij de wetering te komen moet ik eerst over een andere sloot die 5 meter vanaf de wetering parallel daaraan loopt. Die sloot lijkt overbodig. In Canada was hij al lang dichtgegooid. Maar in Nederland heeft alles een doel. Het doel van deze sloot is om het kroosleven met zijn kleine insectjes in stand te houden, en om er een brugje over te leggen zodat je droogvoets bij de grotere vaart kunt komen.

Dat bruggetje had net zo goed een lange plank kunnen zijn. Maar dat oogt niet. Bovendien zou het niet in het teken der welvaart staan.

Honkvast op last van de Nederlandse regering

Daarom is dit een sierlijk bruggetje, stevig gebouwd van ontzettend duur hout dat helemaal uit Brazilië komt. De schilder die mijn zwagers huis aan het opkladden was vertelde me met onverholen trots dat dit bruggetje vast wel op zeven mille kwam. Twee honderd meter verder aan beide kanten liggen er nog twee van die bruggetjes, zodat de bewoners van de aangrenzende straten toch vooral niet om hoeven te lopen om hun hondjes een grote en kleine te laten doen langs het wandelpad (asfalt hoor) dat tussen sloot en wetering ligt. Dat is f21.000 voor een kilometer sloot!

De eendjes in de wetering slapen nog. Maar als ze tussen loerende oogjes die koude Canadees zien, komen ze aankwetteren, belust op stukkies brood. Maar ik heb enkel een peukje om in het water te gooien en verontwaardigd spurten ze weg. Nooit zullen ze moeite hebben met het tabaks-advertentie verbod.

Er komt een man met zijn hondje. Of de man kon niet slapen of het hondje jankte zijn grote nood uit aan de slaapkamerdeur. Meneer is nog in ochtendjas en pantoffels.

Een echte Nederlander zal zo gekleed nooit iemand willen ontmoeten. Daarom draait de man. Hij hoopt dat ik over het bruggetje zal verdwijnen. Ik heb er mijn slinger aan en blijf rustig staan. Ik zeg "Daaag, u bent er ook al vroeg bij." Hij: "Ja, ja, die hondjes hè!" Hij doet de hond van de riem en staartkwispelend holt hij/zij ('k heb het zo gauw niet kunnen zien) weg.

De man slaat zijn ochtendjas wat steviger om zijn mager lichaam. Alle mannen zijn slank in Nederland. Mijn Colijns buikje (u weet toch nog dat Colijn absoluut niet zonder zijn buikje kon, omdat anders zijn gouden horlogeketting niet rustig zou blijven liggen?) heeft wat bekijks gehad. Ook de meneer in zijn blauwgestreepte ochtendjas liet zijn blik dalen. Wist automatisch dat hij met een buitenlander te doen had.

"Met vakantie?" vroeg hij. "Ja, uit Canada," zei ik. "Maar u hebt helemaal geen accent na zoveel jaren," riep hij. Dat wilde ik juist horen. Ik zei: "Ja nou, eigenlijk ben ik in mijn hart nog altijd Nederlander." Er welden tranen in zijn ogen toen hij zei: "'t Is ook zo'n mooi land hè, vindt u niet?" En we keken beiden een beetje verlegen naar de eendjes in de wetering.

Boven de Kagerplassen rees een waterig zonnetje. Misschien, misschien, heel misschien zullen we het zonder regenjassen kunnen stellen vandaag

C.S. Lewis flunks philosophy exam

John Beversluis, C.S. Lewis and the Search for Rational Religion. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985. 182 pp. Paper, U.S. $9.95. Reviewed by Hendrik Hart, Senior Member in Systematic Philosophy, Institute for Christian Studies, Toronto.

The publishers have no one less than Antony Flew hail this book as "The first systematic and radical critique of C.S. Lewis's theological arguments." But the question in my mind about Beversluis' text is: "Should anyone really write a systematic critique of the Lewis' writing as theological argument?" That it is "the first" may well be because no one before Beversluis thought that such a systematic analysis was appropriate, given what Lewis wrote. However, I have it on good authority that someone earned a Ph.D. on a thesis which analysed the theology of the cartoon "Peanuts." So why not a systematic analysis of Lewis as theologian? Whatever the answer to my question, Beversluis sets out to examine the writings of C.S. Lewis to see if they stand up as a serious rational defence of the Christian faith. His finding is that they do not so stand up.

This is an unusual book. It is about the famous C.S. Lewis of The Screwtape Letters. An orthodox or evangelical Christian writing on this C.S. Lewis, who is at the same time a very serious student of Lewis, will usually turn out to be an admirer. And perhaps, after all is said and done, Beversluis is also still an admirer. But for the most part he sets out to undermine the reputation of Lewis as a reputable rational apologete for the Christian faith.

Testing Lewis' rational arguments

People who are admirers of Lewis and who believe that he presented unassailable rational arguments for the Christian faith, or even just for belief in God, will do well to read this book. Intellectuals who take Lewis seriously as an intellectual need to let Beversluis have his say. Teachers and pastors who are enthusiastic readers of Lewis as an ally in their combat against unbelief should allow their enthusiasm to be tested by reading Beversluis. For he demolishes argument after argument as leaky, faulty, empty, specious, or even unbecoming of a self-respecting intellectual. He does so by using a method of examination forged in a philosophical tradition known as the analytic tradition. Grant the validity of the use of this method in examining Lewis as an intellectual apologete and Beversluis will not fail to impress you with his judgment that Lewis has been grossly overrated. More, that Lewis is an embarrassment to defenders of the faith.

Beversluis rests his case, so it seems to me, on the consideration that, in his words, an apologete "must set forth a philosophical defense of Christianity in the hope of establishing claims independently of faith, on the strength of purely rational considerations." With this approach he treats Lewis as a serious professional apologete, theologian, philosopher. And he presents enough evidence to make it plausible that Lewis deserves to be examined on this level.

But I have my doubts. C.S. Lewis' writing, so it seems to me, is a self-contained genre. It belongs to one man, to a certain time, and to a peculiar relationship between British intellectual atheism-skepticism and much-intimidated believers. Lewis spoke to the imagination of the radio listener as an intellectual comforter. And he took his popularity from there. So did market-wise publishers.

Pastoral encouragement is not philosophy

Typically, there are Lewis followers and admirers. For people who want to be encouraged in a world in which their faith is often a cause for their being intimidated, Lewis was a faithful supporter of their cause. And he put it well. But I doubt that these readers engage in seriously examining and weighing Lewis' arguments in the way an analytic philosopher would.

And so what does not exist, as far as I know, is a serious practice among philosophers of religion or professional theological apologetes to refer to the Lewis' writing as significant literature in the profession. At least I would not allow any student in my philosophy class to place a Lewis book on a list of philosophical writings and have it count toward the required number of pages. And not only do serious Christian believers among professionals of my acquaintance not routinely look to Lewis for support, I also do not see many atheist apologetes clinch their case against Christian faith by demolishing Lewis. Atheists I know seem to take the business of Christian apologetics — thank you! — more seriously than that.

Nevertheless, there is a much overrated Lewis cult. And Beversluis succeeds, I hope, in demythologizing the invincible C.S. Lewis. That, I think, was a job someone needed to do. And so all pastors and teachers and other leaders who recommend reading C.S. Lewis as more than popular pastoral encouragement for bewildered college sophomores or even high school seniors should read Beversluis. It will be a sobering experience worth having.

Jerusalem

"Then they returned to Jerusalem from the hill called the Mount of Olives, a Sabbath day's walk from the city." (Acts 1:12)

Have you ever been homesick? I mean really homesick — so homesick that you felt strangled inside and didn't have the energy to do anything but cry? Most of you who immigrated to Canada after World War II felt homesick a time or two, and those stories now bring smiles of remembrance as we read chapter 12 in Albert VanderMey's To All Our Children. Dominee D.J. Scholten, one-time pastor of First Christian Reformed Church in Lethbridge, Alberta, fondly recalls the woman in his congregation who longed to see her relatives in Friesland. One day he met her husband, who wore a huge smile and said, "My wife told me she had a dream and that she had seen all her relatives. Well, I told her to forget about that trip to Friesland. She didn't need it anymore!"

"Aliyah!"

Most times we try to get over homesickness, simply because it saps all our energy and drains our physical resources for carrying on with life where we now exist. But at least one ethnic group has generally tried to preserve and foster homesickness. A wineglass is broken, a cry raised: "Next year in Jerusalem!" Even the youngest Jewish child is partner to celebrations in which he is called to long for "Aliyah," the opportunity to "go up" to Jerusalem.

Three times every year, the Hebrew people would make pilgrimage to Jerusalem, singing from the songbook that was later included in the Bible as Psalms 120-134. From his first conscious thought, the child was taught to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem." (Ps. 122:6) And homesickness for Jerusalem was the sign of spiritual health. (Ps. 137:5-6)

What's so special about Jerusalem?

When the Scottish theologian of the last century, George Adam Smith, travelled to Palestine on a quest to find out what was so special about the "Holy Land," he came away disappointed. The glories of other lands far outshone the desolation he documented. But when he turned back to his Bible and read again of God's special care for that city in the Judean highlands, he was inspired to write these words in his notebook:

The whole plateau stands aloof, waterless, on the road to nowhere. There are none of the natural conditions of a great city. And yet it was here that she arose who, more than Athens and more than Rome, taught the nations civic justice, and gave here name to the ideal city men are ever striving to build on earth, to the City of God that shall one day descend from heaven — the New Jerusalem. For her builder was not nature nor the wisdom of men, but on that secluded and barren site the Word of God, by her prophets, laid her eternal foundations in righteousness, and reared her walls in her people's faith in God.

Are you homesick?

The disciples returned to Jerusalem, lonesome for their Master, homesick for God's next great act. And all the world paused in hushed silence as the Jerusalem above got ready to pour out on the Jerusalem below the wonders of the Spirit who would prepare nations and people to make the final "Aliyah" into the eternal Holy City. (Rev. 21-22)

Are you homesick for Jerusalem?
